Southern Illinois University School of Medicine is a public medical school focused on the health care needs of downstate Illinois. Our mission is to assist the people of central and southern Illinois in meeting their health care needs through education, patient care, research and service to the community.

SIU School of Medicine is an international leader in medical education and a key player in the development of the regional academic medical center in Springfield. Since our founding in 1970, we have graduated more than 2,200 physicians, provided outreach services to dozens of communities, received funding for hundreds of national research projects, and treated thousands of patients.

We work to train caring and competent physicians, to develop new models for providing health care in rural areas, and to provide a clinical practice that anticipates and addresses the health care needs of central and southern Illinois. Our faculty, made up of exceptional physicians and research scientists, set a standard of excellence, emphasizing skills such as problem solving, collegial interaction and the importance of practicing humanistic medicine.
